The Carlisle Loan.

For brevity's sake, we shall hereafter speak of the new loan which the Soc retary of the Treasury asks Congress to authorize him to make as the Carlisle loan. Mr. Carlisle asks for this authority because he does not wish to avail himself of the authority granted in the act of 1875, known as the resumption law. Thi law provides for negotiating loans as means of preserving the reserve fund, but unfortunately names such a high rate of interest that to issue bonds under this act would probably have the effect of lowering the credit of the government. which can now berrow money at 3 per cent., or possibly at even lower rates But not necessarily; for if the rate of interest under the resumption act is too high, the bonds will not be sold at par but at a price depending upon that rate

It is expected that some at least of the silverites in Congress will object to authorizing a new loan, and try to substitute for that proposition a law providing for the coinage of "seigniorage" silver now in the government's hands. Here we may remark that this word "seignlorage" has recently taken on a new meaning.

Many persons think that the government ought to be wholly divorced from the business of banking or that of prowiding a currency for the country. This was the Democratic doctrine in General Tackson's day. But the times have rhanged and the circumstances have changed with them. For nearly thirty years the Federal Government has been engaged in what we may style the banking business. Being in that business, it must resort to bank methods. As banker, Uncle Sam must be always ready to redeem on demand his circulating notes. He must redeem them in the best of money-real money-gold. To redeem them in silver only would be to damage the government's credit, and cause possibly another financial pressure.

Mr. Carlislo in his annual report said on this subject:

en this subject:

"If the authority now existing should be so modified as to empower the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the bonds in denominations or sums of $25 and its multiples, they could be readily disposed of through the sub-reasuries and postof through the sub-treasuries and postoffices without the agency or intervention of banks or other financial institutions and without the payment of commissions. Such bonds would afford to the people at large an opportunity to convert their surplus earnings into a form of security which, while it would be perfectly safe, would not only increase in value by reason of accumulating interest, but be at all times available as a means of prosuring money when needed; and the expe-rould be popular and successful." A large Baltimore banking-house com-
